
Contributors

William L. Anderson is assistant professor of economics at Frostburg State University in Frostburg, Maryland.

Paul A. Cleveland is professor of economics at Birmingham-Southern College in Birmingham, Alabama, and an adjunct scholar of the Center for Economic Personalism. His most recent book is Understanding the Modern Culture Wars: The Essentials of Western Civilization (Boundary Stone, forthcoming).

Richard J. Dougherty is associate professor of politics at the University of Dallas in Irving, Texas, and director of the University's Center for Christianity and the Common Good since 1993. He has written and lectured on a variety of topics, including Saint Augustine, Cicero, Shakespeare, natural law, and on public policy and legal issues, especially those pertaining to Catholic higher education. He earned his bachelor's from Belmont Abbey College in Belmont, North Carolina, and his master's and Ph.D. from the Institute of Philosophic Studies at the University of Dallas.

Daniel Rush Finn teaches at Saint John's University in Collegeville, Minnesota, where he is professor of moral theology and the William E. and Virginia Clemens professor of economics and the liberal arts. He has published extensively on the relation of ethics and economics. His latest book is Just Trading: On the Ethics and Economics of International Trade (Abingdon Press, 1996).

George E. Garvey is vice provost and dean of graduate studies at Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. He is professor of law and teaches courses related to property law, government regulation, and Catholic social teaching. He has twice been a senior Fulbright scholar and has served as counsel to the Judiciary Committee of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Contributors

Stephen J. Grabill is executive editor of the Journal of Markets & Morality, a contributing author to the Foundations of Economic Personalism series, and a research fellow in theology at the Acton Institute for the Study of Religion and Liberty.

James Halteman is Carl Hendrickson professor of business and economics at Wheaton College. With teaching and research areas in microeconomics and the history of economic thought, he has focused attention on moral reflection in economic thinking. Coming from an Anabaptist orientation he has written numerous articles exploring the interface between believers and the market system and has authored the book, The Clashing Worlds of Economics and Faith (Herald Press, 1995).

Robin Klay is professor of economics at Hope College in Holland, Michigan, and an active member in the Association of Christian Economists.

Paul Knepper is professor of criminology and associate dean, College of Human Ecology, East Carolina University. He received a Ph.D. in justice studies from Arizona State University in 1990. He has worked to bring the ideas of political philosophers, such as Michael Oakeshott, Michael Polanyi, and Karl Popper, to criminology. Recent publications include "Oakeshott and the New Crime Prevention," in the Australian and New Zealand Journal of Criminology; and "Faith, Public Policy, and the Limits of Social Science," in Criminology and Public Policy. He is coeditor, along with S. Giora Shoham, of volume 8 of Israel Studies in Criminology.

William H. Lockhart is assistant professor of sociology at Baylor University in Waco, Texas. He received his Ph.D. in sociology from the University of Virginia in May 2001. Prior to his doctoral program, he directed an urban ministry in Wheeling, West Virginia, for ten years, graduating first with a master of divinity from Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary in 1984.

John Lunn is the Robert W. Haack professor of economics and chair of the department of economics, management, and accounting at Hope College in Holland, Michigan. He is an active member in the Association of Christian Economists.

Edward J. O'Boyle is the founder of and senior research associate at Mayo Research Institute where he specializes in identifying flaws in the conventional way of thinking about economic affairs, which originated in Enlightenment individualism and the script stage of human communications; and in setting forth a new economics for the new economy, which rests on the personalism that has been emerging during the electronic stage of human communications. More information on this work and his teaching at Louisiana Tech University is available at www.eoboyle.pageout.net.

Timothy D. Terrell is assistant professor of economics at Wofford College in Spartanburg, South Carolina.

Contributors

Francis Woehrling attended German primary and French secondary school. He obtained a bachelor's in theology and master's in sociology and law and economics at the University of Strasbourg. From 1965 to 1972, he served as an economist at the International Monetary Fund in Washington, D.C. (in charge successively of Israel, Yugoslavia, and Sweden). From 1972 to 1999, he served the European Commission in Brussels, where he monitored the effect of European Monetary Unification on the dollar and various other international currencies. His present interest is with the role of Christianity in the process of globalization.